

Abstract

A preferred embodiment of the subject invention automates the market making process for currency trading. When a quote request for a currency is received from a client (preferably over a computer network such as the Internet), software of a preferred embodiment calculates a real-time bid and ask price for the currency. The subject invention is applicable to any asset for which market making is appropriate, and is not restricted to currency exchange.